Parental Rights Rescinded Without Due Process

By Susan Sanders

It all started when the couple had taken their child to a hospital to be treated for flu-like symptoms. The child was given antibiotics and after the parents asked why, they found out the child did not even need this medication. Following this, they were told the baby needed open heart surgery. After the questionable administration of antibiotics, the parents were concerned about the recommendation of surgery. They understandably wanted a second opinion, so they left the hospital and took their baby to another hospital for evaluation. The first hospital notified police that the baby had not been properly discharged and was under severe neglect. At the second hospital police arrived and it was determined there that the baby was fine and safe to return home with his parents.

However, the following day, police and CPS arrived at their home and kidnapped the baby from his mother's arms. The police and other governmental authorities are sending a strong message that we no longer even have rights to our own children. Simply on the word of the first hospital that the baby was not properly discharged and was in neglect, the findings of the second hospital were ignored and the parents were deprived of their child without a warrant or due process.
